

Postal Service:
A Story of America's #1 Most Disgruntled Mailman
By Phil Terrana

A novel of a fictional letter carrier and his daily frustrations of dealing with postal management

“For an organization obsessed with goals, it seemed that when it came to choosing managers and supervisors, the Postal Service set its sights very low; and then did a very good job of meeting that goal.

And settling for crap at the bottom pretty much insured that there would be crap floating all through the system. In the end, the Postal Service that I left wasn't much different than the old Post Office it replaced.

I think that's what management wanted and that's exactly what it got.”

A novel in the same vein as Charles Bukowski's Post Office: A Novel.
